Q: Trying to get gsp syntax for rendering javascript output Trying to get gsp syntax for rendering javascript code into html. Haven't been able to find any answers out on Google. I would prefer to do it this way as I can have no way of getting a response from the server to run the javascript code on the client (I am using GWT). Currently I am using `var x = 1;` for the output of the javascript and the javascript code just returns 1, no html is returned (which I would like). Not sure if this is the best method to do it either (but it works) Would appreciate any help. A: It is the best method to do it, you can use tag there and run the script directly from the client. The reason why this works is simple - your code is not executed when we're calling of template when we're directly rendering the result into the DOM. Apple Music might be the one streaming music service that's never going to add a rumor or a tease to its page of live coverage about streaming services on social media, like Spotify has done. You probably remember how in 2015 the rumor began that Spotify would buy Bose, and how Bose took the bait. It was a pretty big story, and when Spotify bought Bose, the story was announced live on the Spotify page on Facebook. In the case of the rumors about Apple's acquisition of Beats Music, it's a pretty good guess that if they're true, Apple will be announcing them. And yet, there's no way to actually "follow" them, just like with Spotify. There isn't even a way to see the relevant sections of Apple's social media feeds. If it's true, it's just a matter of time before Apple Music puts out a press release. Apple Music has put a lot of thought into the live social media coverage and the integration with Apple devices. It's almost as if Apple has decided that these rumors are just going to happen in whatever way they

Effects can be used to add special effects to your images, such as blurring, different styles, and so on. If you like them, they can be saved for later use in your own designs. This article assumes that you're comfortable opening and working with Photoshop, that you know how to use the basic tools, and that you know how to work with layers. Applying effects, however, requires a few additional knowledge: Layers: Layers are a big part of Photoshop. They allow you to manipulate and combine different sections of an image. Layers are your canvas, and if you're a beginning user, you will not know any better. GPS: Whenever you are working on a Photoshop file, you're working on a canvas, which is simply referred to as the layers. Layers are the Photoshop analogy to traditional drawing. They allow you to manipulate and composite sections of an image or create an entirely new one. GPS can be a little confusing, though, so I'm going to explain how Photoshop layers work, and how they behave. Photoshop layers Layers in Photoshop are not the same as Photoshop layers. Photoshop has layers just like any other drawing program. Layers are the canvas or 'paper' on which you're working. You create and manipulate them just as you would with graph paper and paint, using a pencil or paintbrush. When you apply an effect to an image in Photoshop, the effect covers all the layers. For example, if you apply a blur to an image with seven layers, you apply the effect to all of them. You can move, resize, and reorder layers. You can merge them, or combine them with transparency. You can even create objects with objects, so you can create a group of multiple layers that you can manipulate as a whole, even though they're contained within the same file. Each layer has its own color. The color is a setting that you can change later. For example, you can make a layer black and white. This could have two effects: the layer becomes transparent, and the portion of the image that is black gets invisible. Step 1 Create a new Photoshop document. File > New. The default is 600 x 600 pixels. I've set it to 800 x 800, though, because you may want to have some room for multiple layers. Step 2 When the Photoshop document appears, click the Layers button on the bar at
