A activates PP2A phosphatase activity by producing an 'open' PP2Ac dimer. PP2A is a heterotrimeric Ser/Thr phosphatase composed of a catalytic C subunit bound to a structural A (platinum-containing) subunit and a regulatory B subunit (B'/B). A peptide representing the PP2A C-terminal domain induces efficient microtubule depolymerization. We show here that calyculin A (CLA), which blocks the phosphatase activity of PP2A, actually activates PP2A phosphatase activity, thus mimicking the effects of the recombinant C-terminal peptide. We produced A and B subunits of PP2A in insect cells and show that CLA induced the formation of an open B'/B heterodimer. The enzymatic activity of the heterodimer was significantly stimulated by CLA treatment. Quantification of the bound heterodimer showed that phosphatase activity was correspondingly increased. Interestingly, CLA did not simply stimulate phosphatase activity, but rather changed the'substrate binding' mechanism of the PP2A heterotrimer from a catalytic to a non-catalytic mode. This suggests that CLA is able to either stabilize or change the conformation of the B/B heterodimer, producing the 'open' heterodimer. Such a conformational change may explain why CLA does not affect PP2A phosphatase activity. We also suggest that the 'open' B'/B heterodimer is not the actual substrate.Social sharing allows users to share articles and other web content to social networks such as Facebook, Twitter, LinkedIn, or the like. Social sharing may involve one or more actors, such as a publisher, a social network, a user, a single sharing button, a group of sharing buttons, a web site, a mobile application, a single social network, or a combination of the above. For example, when a user of a social network shares an article or other content, it may be useful for the user's friends to see the article without having to re-visit the social network. In turn, the user's friends may also share the article with their friends. As a result, traffic to the article may increase and the user may in turn earn new followers or friends. At the b7e8fdf5c8
