If you're not the world's best photoshop expert, it's a free program that has many options to help you. Just remember that when it comes to editing and image manipulation, it's all about what you can do with the program rather than which version you have.

Choosing a file format You can choose from many file formats, and you need to choose which one will best suit your needs. With many file formats you have more flexibility in terms of movement, resizing, and altering images. Unfortunately, most beginner photoshoppers don't have the time or skill set to understand what formats are best for them. Fortunately, free formats are available and free conversion software exists so you can tweak any file format you need, whether it's an image or video file. JPEG is the most popular free format for photographers and commonly used to transfer, save, and share images. JPEG (pronounced "jaypeg") is described as a lossy format. This means it doesn't do any compression of the image, which means it doesn't save much space, but it does save a significant amount of data that's displayed during editing. JPEG is good for the average photographer looking to edit a specific image; however, for those needing to manipulate an image of a lot of people, the file size can grow quickly. Also, it takes longer to save, especially with the changes you've made to the image. JPEG, along with TIFF, is the most popular standard format for general photo use. TIFF (Tagged Image File Format) is a standard file format defined by Adobe and supported by most standard image editing programs. JPEG and TIFF images look the same, and JPEG images can be edited in TIFF files. If you edit in either the JPEG or TIFF file, the image file doesn't need to be converted back to JPEG to be edited, but it can be resaved back to JPEG for other uses. When you use TIFF for final product output, you have more options for the final file size and speed of editing. Although TIFF has a limited number of options to modify an image in the raw file, it has enough of them to allow you to customize and create the look you want. You may have heard of PNG (Portable Network Graphics), and for good reason. But PNG is too large for the average photoshop editing process. It uses a command line program to manipulate your image —
