General Adobe Photoshop's interface has five panes on a computer screen, from top to bottom: the menu bar, workspace, document window, layer, and history. The menu bar is at the top of the screen that contains many options to access other menus, tools, and dialogs; this includes a thumbnail preview of the active image in the window as well. The workspace is a big rectangle below the menu bar. A user can put any number of panels into this workspace, which can be changed when needed, such as when editing documents. The document window is at the bottom of the screen, allowing a user to view the document in its entirety. The user can drag with a mouse, resize the image with the corner resize tools, and crop the document with the selection tools. A user can load many overlays in Photoshop to aid him or her in retouching a picture by using masks, layers, styles, brushes, and much more. The user can create a new document, add new layers, or modify the current document, all by pressing the New Layer icon on the workspace, just to the left of the menu bar. Users can begin by creating a new document by selecting File → New, or by selecting Photoshop → New. This loads the New Document dialog box, which has three different sections: Color, Grayscale, and Black and White. The user can use the fill and stroke icons in the Color section to switch to a grayscale or black and white version of the image; from this dialog, the user can choose black and white or grayscale in the Color Options section. The Color Options section also has the option to use a black and white or color balance. If the user selects the Black and White option or if the Select a Photo For Black and White option is selected, the user is presented with a preview of the photo and can flip through several options to select the ones he or she wants. The user can then navigate through several color options, including Auto Color, Vivid Color, Vivid Black, and Slideshow Color. Under the Color Options section there are also five sliders to enable users to alter their color balance. These are Black, Cyan, Magenta, Yellow, and White. These sliders can be moved back and forth and changed in values to adjust the color balance, the user can also change the output color balance (viewed in a pop-up box when

[Role of left ventricular volume in non-invasive diagnostics of the nature of coronary artery disease]. In 28 patients with the angiographically proven coronary artery disease (CAD) and 20 persons without any symptoms of CAD and without the history of myocardial infarction (MI) were performed the echocardiographic and ECG examinations. The examination included determination of the left ventricular (LV) volume and function by the biplane method, the examination of the left ventricular filling in the early diastole and the parameters of the systolic and diastolic function of the left ventricle. In 20 patients of the examined group with CAD the LV volume was increased, and in 8 of them echocardiographic indices suggested disturbances of the LV function. In the early diastole the duration of the isovolumetric relaxation phase was prolonged. Longitudinal systolic and diastolic abnormalities were revealed in 14 of 20 examined patients, and the LV atrial longitudinal systolic and diastolic function disorders were observed in all of them.Background The Bacillus anthracis genome has been completed and deposited into public databases. This helps us to understand the immune responses to the Gram-positive pathogen and also identify vaccine candidates. Using the completed genome information, we generated (1) live, (2) killed, and (3) subunit vaccines based on these constructs and evaluated these vaccine candidates. The data show that the live vaccine provided the best protection against the challenges in the mouse model. Results The live vaccine generated a very strong immune response compared to the other vaccines. The immune response was Th1 biased and protective against both the Ames and Sterne strains of Bacillus anthracis. However, the immune response was highly strain specific since, not all mice survived challenge with the Sterne strain of Bacillus anthracis.The present invention relates to an automatic tool loading (ATL) system for loading rotary or flat die cutting and perforating machines with a set of dies adapted for operation in a particular job mode and having different nominal axial depths. More specifically, the invention pertains to an ATL system which employs a single, common supply line and a quick loading station for both loading the ATL supply line and the die supply lines. An ATL system allows the operator to set the machine in different job modes by changing the tools. The ATL system must process a set of tools having different nominal axial depths

[Chronic recurrent multifocal osteomyelitis of the ribs]. The chronic recurrent multifocal osteomyelitis (CRMO) is a chronic inflammatory disease of unknown cause. The anatomical site affected by CRMO is the spongy bone which constitutes 10-15% of bone mass. The spectrum of clinical presentation is wide and depends on the location and involvement of the affected bones. The role of CAT scan in the diagnosis is important in the differential diagnosis with other bone diseases, especially osteoporosis. We report a case of a 10 years old girl with recurrent bouts of bone pain with a thoracic presentation of CRMO, seen over a 2 years' period, treated with one course of prednisone and azathioprine.Q: Efficient storage of huge list of open files I have a list of open files, where each file is represented by the name of the file, the offset and the size of the file. The list is currently just a list of strings. Using a linked list, each node keeps a reference to the next node and the information of the first and the last node of the list. Each node has a pointer to the actual file with the offset and size. I will probably use mmap to create the file. The problem is that the list of files is rather big (>100000) and I am wondering if it is a good idea to store it in memory, or if it is better to store it on disk. A: If your list is going to remain as large as it is, I would probably go with a hash map (use a 128-bit hash function). A: Since you're using mmap, I would suggest using it for the very data. If the data is static, just use a 1:1 mapping. If it's something like a "one-time" lookup, you could have an auxiliary table or array.
