Can we use the head of the penis as a reference for measuring penile length? Head of the penis (HOP) as a useful landmark for assessing penile dimensions has been reported widely. The purpose of this study is to examine if using HOP as the reference point for measuring penile length is consistent and reliable. This study retrospectively reviewed 207 cases of clinically normal patients with or without ED at a tertiary referral center. All the patients had their HOP-measured by a single urologist. We compared the difference of HOP-measured from the values determined by the true length of the corpora cavernosa as determined by the sonographic scan. The mean age of the patients was 53.4 ± 14.4 years. The difference between HOP-measured and true length of corpora cavernosa ranged from -2.4 to +3.0 mm with a mean difference of 1.2 ± 0.9 mm. Based on an interval of one standard deviation, we can accept HOP as an alternative reference point for assessing the length of the penis. Further studies with larger populations are warranted to determine whether this algorithm is accurate and reliable.

Ultrastructural study of intracellular localization of the insulin-like growth factor II receptor in lymphoid leukemic cells. Leukemic cells of four cases of acute lymphoblastic leukemia and one case of lymphoma were examined for ultrastructural localization of the insulin-like growth factor II receptor. An excess of the receptor was observed on the cell surface of all the specimens studied, where it was stably bound to the cytoplasmic face of the cell membrane. Electron microscopy of gold-labeled protein showed numerous clusters of gold particles mostly on the surface of the rough endoplasmic reticulum, on the surface of the free ribosomes, but also on the smooth endoplasmic reticulum. The insulin-like growth factor II receptor was most often observed on the rough endoplasmic reticulum with no evidence of labeling of the smooth endoplasmic reticulum, rough or smooth. The localization of the receptor along the rough endoplasmic reticulum may be related to the synthesis of this receptor which involves short-term production of RNA for translation to protein.

It is common practice for a developer to test software before it is released to the public by creating a test version of the software and attempting to exercise and verify the software's behavior. This process of testing the software before it is released is commonly referred to as beta testing. Such testing may be carried out by a number of parties such as the software developer, the users of the software, or external organizations such as governmental and defense agencies. In most cases, beta testing is performed by a user or developer on a test computer using a test version of the software to stress the version of the software to be released. Often beta testing may occur in a phase of software development that is concurrent with software development. In other cases, beta testing may occur after development and after release. Testing is frequently performed after the software is developed to assure that
