Seven crossbred beef steers were used to study the effect of actual rates of O2 uptake on O2 consumption estimates. For this study, O2 consumption was measured simultaneously, over a wide range of metabolic rates, using a combination of metabolic carts and manometers with microcirculation techniques. The metabolic carts were held in a close-loop system, where gas samples were analyzed in a mass spectrometer, to determine the real instantaneous flow rates of O2, CO2, and CH4. Respiratory exchange ratios (R) were calculated as the ratio of O2 consumed to CO2 produced. Using these results, and measurements of volumetric blood flow rates, estimated O2 consumption rates were calculated for the muscle areas (some skeletal muscles were not entirely scanned). Thus, the O2 consumption estimated from the measured metabolic rates correlated significantly (P less than.05) with the O2 consumption estimated at the metabolic rate threshold (60 mg O2.kg-1.min-1) and at the metabolic rate that corresponds to 50% of the maximum O2 uptake rate of the animals (180 mg O2.kg-1.min-1). These results suggest that the metabolic rate estimated for a limb is a good indicator of the metabolic rate for a specific area of skeletal muscle. The invention relates to a device for holding a vacuum cleaner in a position, while the device is attached to a wall surface. A vacuum cleaner is normally suspended by a strap, which is detachably attached to the vacuum cleaner, or to another support. The invention concerns a device for supporting a vacuum cleaner from a wall surface by detaching the
