This study evaluates the osteochondral repair and the properties of the formed cartilage tissue in a model of articular cartilage defect in rabbits' knees. Autologous chondrocytes from rabbits' knees were isolated and cultured. Chondrocytes were seeded in novel Type-I collagen-glycosaminoglycan (GAG) scaffold and implanted into defect created in rabbits' knee joints. Tissue formed in defect site was macroscopically and histologically evaluated. Electron microscopy demonstrated the presence of well-developed lacunae containing chondrocytes. Implantation of cartilage tissue increased the joint function, which correlates with reduced signs of disease in rabbits.
