How long is the event run for? Is it local or international? Will any other similar events be taking place in the area? Consider the day of the week, time of the year, and what the event is for. How are other events run? What do the organizers need to know? What are the overall needs of the organization hosting the event? Determine if the event will be successful. Consider the economic realities of the event. Will it be successful in helping the organization to reach its long term goals? Is there a need for the event? What is the return on investment for the event? Will it be advantageous to the event, the organization, and ultimately the individual involved? Assess the Need for the Event Is there a dire need for this event to be produced? Are there other ways to accomplish the same or similar goals? Do you see a need for this event to take place? Are the goals to be fulfilled by this event possible through other means? Gain Detailed Information on the Event Will the event be successful? What is it going to cost to produce this event? Is it possible to save money and still have a successful event? Who is the target audience for this event? Who will be attending? What does the audience expect from the event? Is the audience expecting entertainment, education, or both? What are the expectations of the attendees? Will they be satisfied with just entertainment or do they also expect education as well? How about the organizers? Will they be comfortable with a certain amount of professionalism? Anticipate Problems and Be Prepared Once the event is finalized, plan for any problems that may arise. Being able to adjust or even cancel the event to accommodate a problem or circumstance is better than finding out the problems arise after the event has been performed. Do Not Accept the Event Consider carefully if this event is something that will be beneficial to your career 595f342e71
