The study, “The Economic and Social Costs of the ‘Death Penalty’ in the United States” (pdf), finds that the state spends on average $8.3 million per year to execute convicted murderers. “The figure is also highly correlated with murder rates in that state,” explains lead author V. Craig Simmons, an economist at Texas A&M University. “Some states have death penalty statutes that call for more trials and convictions than they would need to kill a defendant outright,” Simmons and co-authors — Kimberly Layne, an economist at the University of Texas at Austin, and John R. Lott Jr., an economist at the University of Pennsylvania — write. The study thus focuses “mostly on the more common practice of the death penalty.” Importantly, the study includes all executions since 1976, including lethal injections and other forms of execution, such as electric chair use. The authors point out that “the number of executions is roughly constant across time, in spite of changes in the population of defendants on death row.” To find out just how much the “death penalty” costs in terms of the money spent, paid to private contractors to carry out executions, and the time spent by prison guards, prosecutors and other government employees, the authors added up these costs with death row population numbers and cost estimates from 1995, a late time point for which they used data from the Bureau of the Census and the Bureau of Justice Statistics. Roughly 17 people are currently
