AFFIRMED 4 the most burning question: why not do this with housing? As Americans grapple with the impact of the Great Recession and structural barriers to a full recovery, and in a country whose history is littered with black and brown families who were locked out of housing, it is time to seriously consider a refundable tax credit. A tax credit would give every household making less than $100,000 a chance to take a $6,000 tax credit in their first year of receiving it. The tax credit could be structured such that it can only be used on first-time home purchases and each adult working income-earner could receive $2,000. In other words, it would give every household making less than $100,000 a chance to take a $6,000 tax credit in their first year of receiving it. This tax credit could be structured such that it can only be used on first-time home purchases and each adult working income-earner could receive $2,000. This is not quite as radical as it might sound. About 6 million families receive a refundable tax credit right now, so it would cost about $50 billion for a program targeted at people who would be hurt badly by this year's median-income tax hike. Even if we used it to just replace the average deduction, we would save $100 billion in taxes every year.
