Your favorite game, Delta Force Land Warrior, has been cracked for PC .There's a new governor in town: Former State Senator Adam Ebbin, who is currently serving as the Lt. Governor of Maine, will be sworn in on March 17, 2018. Photo: NBC News/Matt Marton via Getty Images After a week of rumors that Maine Governor Paul LePage was going to resign, the Governor held a press conference last evening confirming that he was stepping down. But during the course of that press conference, LePage did not address the situation entirely on the record, leaving potentially unsavory details of his personal life to be discovered by Maine media. Reed College President Max Baucus, who has been tapped to replace LePage as governor, began by acknowledging that the situation was not a "happy affair" and that he understood the Republicans who had been resigning themselves over the course of the last several days. Baucus then went on to comment on his own future as Governor, saying he had reached a decision regarding what he would seek to do next in life. "I will follow the path that's going to take me closer to, and that's going to make me, and I hope make the people of Maine, as happy and as successful as possible, and having the most impact in the world," Baucus said. "So that's what I'm going to do. But I will not be governing. I'm not going to govern. I'm not going to, I want to be working on educational issues, help kids, help out their parents and their teachers, that sort of thing.” “So I have not thought about that at all,” Baucus added. “...I’m going to go work on the issues that I’m going to do and not spend any time thinking about the Governor’s Office.” Baucus also confirmed that LePage’s state budget proposals would not pass the legislature’s annual budget vote on
