You have to be mad. Who are you to say you know this piece. you do not. you are a fool to think so. I am telling you it is not by Holbein. The work is not by Holbein. If you had studied art history instead of trying to distort the truth, you would have seen that Hans Holbein the Younger was a contemporary of the artist here. This is a piece from the 17th. century, two centuries before Holbein was even born. It is not Holbein's work. It is a modern artist. Very likely a German (Holbein was Swiss). The style is of this time. I have a book in German that talks about all the different styles of painting at this time. You say it looks like Holbein. This is the kind of argument that leads people down the wrong path. It is not Holbein. Period. End of story. If you studied art history instead of trying to distort the truth, you would have seen that Hans Holbein the Younger was a contemporary of the artist here. Interesting argument, because it implies that you think that if a work is wrong, it must be Holbein's. I'm not seeing a clear indication of that. And so, despite the title being "painting of a court painter," the point-of-view is not explicitly that of a court painter, but rather that of an artist addressing his patron. I don't know if this is an issue of the use of the term "court painter," and it could also be that the aversus was intended to signify, in addition to Holbein, other German artists (such as
