1 Comment Script obfuscator 5.1.0 has some more options as options in the program. Using the new built-in "Internet Explorer BHO" and "old IE Helper", the program can also add code to the beginning of all website text files. The program does not alter the webpage, it simply injects a code into it right at the top of the file. This code will give your PC some tools if the browser of the user automatically changes the code. This code will inject a number of options in the profile of the browser. A web browser uses a security profile that represents the browser. The security profile in most cases is not only unique, but is also hidden. This means that the current web browser can not always be detected. For example, this can also include the browser "Microsoft Edge". With the help of this kind of technology, the program can make sure that all the security is working even if an alternative browser is used. The function of this code is also to create the browser history on the PC. This is important for the software to correctly work as it must be able to detect the web browser. By adding a history, the program will also keep information about the previous websites visited by the user. It is possible that the program inserts a combination of the options above, so that the user can take advantage of the individual features of the program.Q: How to handle input data via socket, stop listening & closing? I have written a server application to accept input from a local machine via socket connection, and when the server receives data, it will generate and send response to the client via a different socket. My question is: is it possible to manually terminate the listening socket from client side, or at least listen to connection but do not read input data? I have tried calling shutdown() function, but I found it won't work with listening socket, I checked the output of netstat command, and found my server socket is in LISTEN status. In my client side, I connect the socket to the server socket, and I am currently trying to read the available input data, when I send a QUIT command, I'll close the socket on the server side, and this may causes the server not to read data from client. How can I complete this scenario? A: You can't "manually terminate the listening socket" - it terminates b7e8fdf5c8
