The breakthrough of a new group of superconductors with a transition temperature close to room temperature -- 15 K -- has prompted physicists to reconsider the long-standing belief that high-temperature superconductors should have a certain maximum transition temperature that can't be exceeded. Researchers first isolated these materials in 2007. Up to now, the new high-temperature superconductors with a maximum temperature of about 15 K have been prepared as compact, thin films. But the discovery of new high-temperature superconductors has made it possible for scientists to fabricate bulk crystals, and soon it will also be possible to study them as single crystals. Why is there a limit to the superconducting temperatures of all known high-temperature superconductors? "We have long believed that we know all about high-temperature superconductors," says Hsin Lin, professor of physics at the University of Colorado and a member of the National High Magnetic Field Laboratory, which collaborates with CU-Boulder. "But as it turns out, we don't. This discovery shows that there's much more to be learned." Lead researcher Feng Li and his team at the Chinese Academy of Sciences have discovered new forms of Cu-based perovskite complex oxides. These new compounds have a maximum superconducting transition temperature of about 15 K, much higher than any known high-temperature superconductor, Li says. One compound can be superconducting without the need for any element substitution. Other compounds require high percentages of substitutions to exhibit superconductivity. Feng and his team believe their latest discoveries will help develop new high-temperature superconductors. "We can synthesize our new compounds with very good control over their physical properties, and soon we'll be able to synthesize large, high-quality single crystals," says Li. "This is a very exciting discovery in the field of high-temperature superconductivity." Most of what we know about high-temperature super
