Bernie Sanders at a Southern Democratic Convention on Wednesday night. The 104-year-old politician delivered a powerful speech at the University of South Carolina’s Pullman Campus Center, urging his followers to stick to Sanders’ message of “Socialist” ideals. “Sen. Sanders has been practicing what he has preached for the past 30 years,” Mr. Carter said. “He is pursuing an independent course.” “Many Americans believe Sen. Sanders’ policies would be too expensive, and would hurt many people’s lives,” Carter continued, arguing that Mr. Sanders’ “Socialist” ideas should be viewed as a step in the right direction. “Our future demands that we have national health insurance,” he said. “This does not mean the government will take over your health care. It will simply mean that the government will help provide you with medical care at the point of your need.” Mr. Carter said Sanders’ plan would also benefit the working class, arguing that the average American would save over $5,500 a year with the plan. “If we have a national health insurance plan, we can provide better care for working class people than can the private insurance companies,” he said. “There is a good chance that this will be our last chance to make a decision to vote for a presidential candidate who has followed the values that we worked for in South Carolina and that will continue to support those who vote for him,” he added. “Wake up and join the rest of the people in this country,” Carter urged. The former president also touted Sanders’ achievements in fighting poverty, including attending the annual Hunger Summit in Washington D.C. last year. “Sen. Sanders has been a big supporter of mine for many years,” he said. “I have been impressed with the work that he and his organization have done and accomplished in fighting poverty.” He then transitioned into a critique of the Democratic National
