To do so, copy the following code and paste it into your website.(Reuters) - The United States is preparing to resume broader immigration talks with Mexico in about 10 days, but will retain a hard line against any deal that would allow any illegal immigrants to stay in the country, U.S. and Mexican officials said. A boy looks at an advertisement for the Disneyland attraction in Anaheim, California, U.S. August 23, 2017. REUTERS/Mike Blake President Donald Trump has long threatened to end a temporary program that has allowed thousands of Central Americans fleeing violence and poverty in their home countries to stay and work in the United States while awaiting approval of their asylum requests. The program, known as the "safe third country" agreement, has protected Mexico's asylum system from being overwhelmed by those seeking to come to the United States. But Trump on Friday said he would terminate the agreement with Mexico, calling it "very unfair" to the United States. It marked a shift in U.S. policy, and Mexico agreed in principle on Monday to a shorter workand-travel permit scheme that would allow some Central American families to remain in Mexico while their asylum claims were processed. But Trump, who has made cutting legal immigration to the United States a mainstay of his presidency, appeared unwilling to settle for less than a full end to the program with Mexico. "We're not going to talk about a safe third country. That's not a part of the equation," said a senior administration official at the White House, speaking on condition of anonymity. "This is not an arrangement with Mexico where anything can be delivered," he said. "It is a firm commitment by the United States not to reward people who crossed the border illegally and to secure our borders."
