HurricaneDorian has affected Bahamas heavily on Monday, with vast areas hit with floodingincluding the Grand Bahama International Airport, Freeport. PleaseÂ .In many software products, the software's installer automatically uses the standard system directory for user-specific files during installation. When the customer installs the product, the customer's personal files may be in a directory on a different volume than where the installer is located. Further, the customer's computer may already contain files that the installer may need to access during installation. The user-specific directory may also not be the same as the directory in which the program files are stored. As a result, the installer may look for files in different locations depending on the installation method used. This may pose a problem if the installer does not find the files the customer expects it to find.Q: How to read a file whose name is passed in from the command line in Java I have a java program that takes an input file as command line argument. For example: java MyProgram inputFileName Now, inputFileName is the name of a file that is passed in from the command line. This file may or may not exist depending on whether or not the program is invoked. Also, this is the file that I'm after. I would like to read this file in Java and display it. Any ideas as to how I can do this? Thank you. A: I would suggest you reading about java.io.File or org.apache.commons.io.FileUtils. A: The constructor of File loads the content of a file into memory. You can also use the static methods of the classes in the apache commons io (from java 6) to load files: public static BufferedReader readFromFile(File file) Returns a BufferedReader object that is backed by the data in the given file. public static BufferedReader readFromURL(URL url) 1cdb36666d
