Of course, a single evolutionally optimized neural representation of an object will not suffice for object recognition - an object's surface pattern would have to be deconstructed for that purpose into a set of separable features, each recognized and stored via a distinct neural representation. Both my LIF model and the canonical network model (see the first image) are good candidates for the object recognition system - the latter would be effective if it could evolve the relative size of its receptive fields to accommodate the object at hand. However, the question of whether our brain is really the end result of an evolutionary optimization process raises further
