In this paper we propose a new randomized method for approximating the estimator of the Shapley value, which is based on computing the integral of a function defined over a multivariate distribution. This method is compared with the approach of Tsiligianakis and Xananassov (2016) in the case of two-dimensional distributions and it has the advantage of using fewer samples than the classical Monte Carlo approach. The multivariate function proposed in the present paper may seem simpler than the approximation used in the past by Tsiligianakis and Xananassov (2016), which takes the advantage of a first-order Taylor expansion and provides the covariance matrix and its inverse. Our method, instead, requires the evaluation of a function with non-linear parts, which makes it more costly and harder to calculate.

However, it is very flexible and allows us to take into account a pre-existing density function and to implement different approximations of each parameter. The paper concludes by showing how to generate random samples from a multivariate distribution in which a random function is evaluated at each sample of the partition. The method is suitable for the approximation of the Shapley value, but it can be extended to other functions of interest in multi-agent games.
