Effects of osmotic stimulation on paracrine action of nasal cavity. After hyperosmotic stimulation, the paracrine and autocrine actions of the nasal cavity were investigated. The relationship between the secretion and action of different kinds of nasal glands was explored. The permeability of nasal mucosa was measured by transepithelial electrical resistance. The secretion and action of the nasal glands were estimated by radioimmunoassay. Hyperosmotic stimulation significantly increased permeability of the nasal mucosa. The protein content in the secretion of the nasal glands was significantly elevated, and the activities of carbonic anhydrase were also increased. The secretion of the nasal glands was increased. The permeability of the nasal mucosa was increased, which suggests that the nasal mucosa could be

Ambrasius Saint Ambrasius or Ambrasius of Neuss (died 110/112) was a prolific early Christian saint from what is now the Netherlands. He was a priest who lived during the reign of Emperor Trajan, and was martyred in the year AD 110 or 112. He is the patron of the Austrian city of Ambras, as well as of the cities of Nuenhausen and Frankfurt am Main in Germany. Early life Born in the city of Neuss in Lower Rhenish-Westphalia, Ambrasius spent most of his youth with Saint Lambert in the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Kent. Aged fifteen, he took holy orders and became a priest in the city of Cologne. Later, he worked in several places in that city, including the church of Saint Lawrence, the municipal archdiocese, and the cathedral chapter. Ecclesiastical career Some sources, beginning with Lambert of Hersfeld, have Ambrasius doing missionary work in the East. He has been described as the first apostle of the southern Germanic area. The Byzantine Emperor Trajan II was so struck by his work that he offered to pay for the construction of his monastery. On October 21, 1002, Ambrasius was sent by emperor Otto III and his successors to preach to the Saracens and other non-Christian peoples of the Holy Roman Empire. By 1046, Ambrasius had preached in Lower Alsace, and founded the Priory of Belmont near Belfort. In 1098, he was invited to Milan by the late emperor, and he is recorded as preaching there on a frequent basis until 1103. In 1100, Ambrasius joined the Hermann monastery in the little town of Nuenhausen, today in the state of Hessen, Germany. Death and burial Ambrasius was killed under mysterious circumstances on the first day of the year AD 110 or 112. He was buried in the church of Saint Lawrence in Cologne, where his relics were taken by emperor Otto III after his death in the year 1164. A "chamber of the true cross" in the imperial treasury was constructed from the silver cover of Ambrasius' true cross, which was held in the treasury at the time of the First Crusade. Veneration Shortly after his martyrdom, Ambrasius
