Stage-specific cell-cell interactions that control the fate of the dorsal anlagen in the chick and mouse limb. A number of findings lead to the conclusion that the outgrowth of limbs is a developmental process which involves the activity of two opposing sets of morphogenetic forces. One set represents a mechanistic component associated with the extensive spatial and temporal reorganization of the dorsal ectoderm. The second set is related to the actions of the neuroectoderm in controlling the fate and differential growth of the limb. We have examined the onset and the duration of the two components. Based on data from experiments using the bird embryo, it is suggested that the initial component is largely due to the activity of a tensive force in the dorsal ectoderm which is relatively spatially and temporally unrestricted. This force dominates the initial phase of limb outgrowth and is reversible. The activity of the second component--that of the neuroectoderm--is clearly defined and almost always restricted to a brief period of time during the second half of chick embryo development. The onset of the neuroectoderm-dependent phase correlates with the onset of mesenchymal proliferation, and its duration corresponds to that of the prolonged period in which the growth and differentiation of the limb mesenchyme are controlled by the activity of the neuroectoderm. The data suggest the following model of limb formation. Initiation of limb outgrowth is achieved by the activity of an extracellular force, possibly of neural origin. An initial phase of limb outgrowth is under the control of the first mechanistic component. The second phase of limb outgrowth is controlled by the activity of the neuroectoderm.Anteroposterior grading of spinal cord compression. Evaluation of 55 patients. We define anteroposterior grading (AP grading) of spinal cord compression for 25 patients and 5 controls. A spinal cord compression occurs when the spinal canal or a vertebral canal is decreased. When the compression is severe, it is difficult to move the extremities. We demonstrated that AP grading was more sensitive than James grading. AP grading was also useful in evaluating spinal cord compression by various disorders. AP grading was also useful in determining whether the spinal cord was endangered.Q: Filtering a 2D array by index I have a 2D array, but I can't figure out the correct code to make a filtered array.
