The Justice Department sent a stern letter to the editorials board of the Los Angeles Times demanding an immediate retraction of an article that appeared Sunday over the objections of the White House press office. The article, which appeared in the print edition of the Times, and was entitled "Trump declares public health emergency over opioid crisis; signs $8.8 billion package," came on the heels of a Wednesday congressional hearing on the crisis where Trump asserted a national emergency to circumvent Congress to get that $8.8 billion into combating the national public health crisis. Facing criticism, the White House quickly pointed out that Trump's assertion of a national emergency was in response to the crisis, and not because he wanted the money by executive action. Shortly after the article was published, the Times' editorials board found that the article contained a number of inaccuracies and factually challenged claims which called into question the integrity of the story and the motives behind its publication. They strongly objected to its publication and continued to object on that basis. In a letter to the editor's board on Monday, senior White House Counsel Pat Cipollone, Deputy Chief of Staff for Communications, Lindsay Walters, Counsel to the President and Public Liaison, and Associate White House Counsel Michael McEntee, objected to the publication, saying, "The inclusion of these incorrect statements not only misleads the public about the substance of the President's actions, it also undermines and distorts the clarity of the message conveyed to the American people by the President's actions." The letter went on to say, "To be clear, the White House does not view its objection to this story as an attempt to 'sue the Times' or raise the specter of further inaccuracies. Nor do we intend to be unduly disruptive to the publication's important work. Instead, we are simply requesting that your publication correct the record and issue a public retraction and apology." The letter went on to say, "We continue to hope that the Times will reexamine its decision to print this story and publish a full retraction."
