I want to automatically configure PhpStorm to show a notification when I modified a file. Basically, I'm looking for a similar functionality like Visual Studio Code, that allows to configure an file to be notified if I modify it. In Visual Studio Code, the solution to this is the in-built "workspace notifications". Is there such a feature in PhpStorm? A: Unfortunately, there is no built-in feature currently, but you can create your own custom action in PhpStorm or FileWatcher plugin for PhpStorm. Your custom action will be executed whenever you've opened a file, or when you've changed a file, or added a file. It's possible that each type of changes will trigger action in different times, so I've described all of them here. To create your own custom action, go to Settings/Preferences | Editor | General | Custom Actions. Click the '+' sign to add a new custom action. You may create multiple actions for each type of changes that you need. You can set events to be triggered when you change certain type of files: When you create a file: PhpStorm will be opened for editing with an empty file named by default --.extension, where is current project name, is action name and is current version of project. You can change file name by clicking the 'rename' button or leave default name if it suits you better. When you modify a file: PhpStorm will be opened for editing with an unchanged file with default name if it's opened by another file (which is probably the case if you haven't yet opened the file), otherwise it will open a new file without any extension. When you remove a file: PhpStorm will be opened for editing with an unchanged file with default name if it's opened by another file (which is probably the case if you haven't yet opened the file), otherwise it will remove all files which are different than the current working directory and don't have an extension. When you add a file:
