Photoshop is quite flexible, and with some patience and practice, you can do much more than you ever thought possible. However, you don't have to be a Photoshop superstar to use Photoshop. I explain the basics of using Photoshop in Book IV, Chapter 1. ## Getting Familiar with Photoshop Elements After starting with Photoshop, one of the first things you want to do is check out Photoshop Elements, Adobe's web-based publishing tool and better-than-average retouching program. This software gives you a new starting point and eliminates the possibility of starting with an Adobe Photoshop CS2 program and then purchasing a Photoshop CS3 program, as was the case with some previous versions. The program's name hints at the features it includes: Elements. An added bonus is that the program's name is a sibling to Photoshop itself. This similarity gives you a hint that Elements may be similar to the program you already know. Because the two programs work so well together, you're apt to have more fun and success if you use both programs. Adobe doesn't make images with Photoshop Elements; instead, the program builds images into a JPEG format. You can import images in the native JPEG format or other formats, such as TIFF. In addition, you can use Images for Designers (IMDs), which are graphics you can create yourself using the program. You can also create graphics using Smart Objects and other features in Photoshop Elements. You find out how to create and manipulate images using Photoshop Elements in Book IV, Chapter 2. For now, stick with getting the hang of some of the program's shortcuts and keyboard shortcuts. ## Easy Steps to Master Photoshop Elements You may start with Photoshop Elements and not know it, or perhaps you already know Photoshop Elements but have trouble remembering where to find a specific feature and how to use it. Regardless, the following steps should help you get familiar with Elements' features and enhance your Photoshop experience.

In this morning's New York Times, there's a thorough and searching article on the ways retailers are taking advantage of their online presence to facilitate on-the-ground sales. "Companies like Amazon, eBay and Google are putting the squeeze on retailers through their own e-commerce sites, for example, by tacking on services not offered by brick-and-mortar stores," writes Robert J. Samuelson. The article concludes with a warning from a Walmart exec: "When Walmart began selling new homes in 2008, it quickly realized that much of its sales were by phone. The company used its online retail site as a bridge between its brick-and-mortar stores and the many people who phone for customer service." I believe that point captures a broader trend -- but one the media are loath to acknowledge. The popular term for the phenomenon is "showrooming." The focus is on laptops; we'll use that shorthand for the broader phenomenon. (Note: this is one of the reasons I like the New York Times -- its reporters are clearly in the class of true journalists; they seem to notice things that other media don't, even things that a lot of journalists don't understand. The Times is ahead of the curve in this case.) Last year, a couple of smart young people in Thailand figured out how to showroom by using their smartphone to surf the websites of not only their laptop's competitor but dozens of competing companies. They used the navigation features on some of them to hop from place to place (the MacBook Air, the Asus tablet, etc.) and made a game of checking out the styles and features on each while never actually making the final purchase. For example, they might come to a page listing the features of a particular MacBook Air. To see if they liked it, they'd click through to the other sites, such as Asus's, that they were based out of and learn whether they thought the same features were important. Pretty soon, they could look at a laptop from Dell, Lenovo, Asus, Apple, Acer, Google's Chromebooks, Barnes & Noble's Nook and Sony, and so on, in each case comparing the features offered. Some were more attractive than others -- this is why shoppers have electronic showrooms that allow them to peek inside competitors' windows. BusinessWeek.com's Peter Faricy notes that this is an age-old technique but that it's now more relevant: [T]here are now more Americans on

What's New in the?

Keeping the Cardinals in the Central: A Blueprint for the Future Roster moves this offseason have come and gone but the Cardinals continue to rebuild, and rebuild in a smart, cost-effective manner, and as we all know there is still a lot of roster flexibility in the league. It may be time to consider just what exactly is a blueprint for the future of the Cardinals. Maybe the blueprint is less about roster moves and more about building a plan and structure that can last a long time. Fact is, the Cardinals have been scheming since 2012 and they are not done scheming. They have a vision of how they see this roster looking in the future and they are striving to make that vision become a reality. This vision is to build a championship contender by constructing a 10-12 man roster that consists of at least four homegrown players and a core of 3-4 homegrown players/rookies, a quality depth roster and an incredible bullpen. Their success may just be judged by whether or not they fulfill this vision. The Cardinals have already realized they have a great, deep organization. They have a strong farm system, an ace in front of their rotation, a deep bullpen, two quality starters in Wainwright and Lance Lynn, and a rotation of Carpenter, Molina, Lance Lynn, and Jaime Garcia. Their biggest weakness was their lack of depth, but that is no longer a problem. This roster should be playing in October, and when it does it will benefit from the dynamic of a team that has seen each other from the beginning of the season and will have a supporting cast that should feel like family. The Cardinals have been trying to do things their own way since 2012. They are trying to do things they feel are important to them, and they are willing to make adjustments along the way. Michael Wacha and Trevor Rosenthal are homegrown players that will likely have a significant impact on the 2016 Cardinals. Rosenthal made a name for himself as a valuable “closer-by-committee” guy who was going to push Carlos Martinez to the big leagues at the time. Now, Rosenthal is the closer and Martinez is well on his way to being the third starter on a young pitching staff that features one of the game’s top young prospects in Jack Flaherty. Meanwhile, Wacha has established himself as an ace and should be the ace of the future. Sticking with him, the Cardinals recently bumped Garcia up from the bullpen and inserted him into the rotation.
