[Protein profiling of pig muscle at different post-mortem periods]. In the frame of proteome research on porcine meat, a simplified proteomic approach consisting of SDS-PAGE and on-gel trypsin digestion was used to determine the protein composition of two muscles of a normal pig at different post-mortem periods (1, 2, 4 and 6 h). The proteome of the two muscles (longissimus lumborum and vastus lateralis) significantly changes with post-mortem time but basically follows the same pattern. The number of protein spots detectable by 2D-PAGE (150 and 240 protein spots for vastus lateralis and longissimus lumborum, respectively) increases with post-mortem time. After 6 h post-mortem, 40 protein spots were only detectable in the first gel and 30 in the second gel. The number of detectable protein spots not only increases with post-mortem time, but also with muscle. For the first time a significant difference in the post-mortem time-related protein composition of two muscles could be demonstrated. Our results show that the study of muscle proteome profiles is not only a valuable tool for meat quality assessment, but it also helps in the understanding of meat ageing.

The discovery that the human genetic disorder of beta-thalassemia is caused by mutations affecting the gene coding for beta-globin has led to an explosion in the study of the human globin gene families, the globin genes and proteins themselves, and their relationship with hematological diseases, in particular sickle cell anemia. The long-range objective of the proposed research is to understand how a single gene and its protein product, hemoglobin, can generate such great diversity of functions and pathologies. The proposed research will focus on the relationships between the globin gene promoters and the role of regulatory nucleotide sequences in the function of globin genes. Among the proposed projects are: a) Delineation of the functional differences between one beta-globin promoter and its mutants by the identification of DNA-protein complexes formed in vitro by the two beta-globin gene promoters and the erythroid-specific trans-acting factors. b) Preliminary characterization of one protein which can interact specifically with the human beta-globin gene promoter region using the nitrocellulose filter binding assay (FBA). c) Identification of the liver-specific transcription factors that bind to the conserved hepatocyte-specific enhancer of the human beta-globin gene. The 2017 Australian Touring Car Championship is a hot property. Not only is the recently re-formed category a highly-successful gateway to the upper echelons of the V8 Supercars series, but it's always packed. With three manufacturers' grids come three different race formats with two Supercars chasing glory in what was previously the point scoring format of the series. In 2017, it's a two-way shoot-out – just as it's been in many years past. MORE: Our 2017 Australian Touring Car Championship season preview Fans now have fewer points to play with but the championship title itself has increased in value. Nevertheless, it's still the King of the Ring. More than that, it's an incredibly successful formula that has been in place for over a decade. With the same format used to produce the first season of the Telstra Sandown 500, too many fans have grown accustomed to the format. #7 Team Ulysse Neukirch (88) More than anything, endurance racing is a test of a team's approach, although it's a test
