The Little Book of Talent is an easy-to-use handbook of scientifically proven, field-tested methods to improve skills - your skills, your kids' skills,.To the Self-Conscious and Unselfconscious, This Wine Might Just Be the Catnip of Choice As anyone who enjoys a good glass of wine will be aware, it's not always easy to pick a bottle - in fact, some of it can often be painfully difficult. For those of us who enjoy this pre-dinner/post-dinner drink, it's also true that sometimes there are wines which are difficult to enjoy because you just don't want to drink them. And the situation is made worse by the fact that some wines are meant to be consumed at short notice – the term can get quite close to “on demand”. Sometimes, then, it's time to send some love to your wine collection, and ask yourself whether there's a bottle which has been around for a while but has, in recent years, been unjustly overlooked. This is the story of Domaine de La Barre, a producer based in the Loire, which is not really to everybody's taste, but which is really quite good. And it's certainly one of those which can be enjoyed both in the short term and – hopefully – in the long term. The problem with La Barre is that, unlike most small chateaux, it focuses on what is sometimes known as petit verdot – a full-bodied red wine grape, quite similar to cabernet sauvignon, and which is usually used for fuller reds. And then, unlike most chateaux, La Barre is owned by the Château de Chevalier family, who also own Château Batailley, in the Rhône, which like La Barre is made from petit verdot. So, although it's very nice, the wine is perhaps best described as a verdot-centred château. Of course, verdot is not the same as cabernet, and it's slightly more austere than cabernet, but it's a fine thing. The
