In digital communication systems, a digitally represented information sequence is divided into fixed length packets. The packets are typically transmitted in serial form over a wide area network such as the public switched telephone network, (PSTN), or over a local area network (LAN). The packet may represent a digitized voice signal, a still digital image, a video signal, etc. Each packet typically contains a header for conveying information about the packet. The header contains fields that enable a recipient to identify information about the packet. The recipient typically includes a packet recovery unit (PRU) for extracting the header from a received packet, and for extracting the payload or body of the packet. The PRU may further perform error correction on the packet. The header typically includes at least one field that is a synchronization indicator or a timing indicator. For example, a traditional numbering scheme (ten-bit) synchronizes the PRU of a receiving modem to the timing of the transmitted signal. Such a scheme is described in detail in U.S. Pat. No. 4,959,848 entitled "Process and Apparatus for Implementing Asynchronous Transmission Control Protocol (ATC)", which is incorporated by reference herein. The synchronizing scheme traditionally used in the PSTN or in the LAN is usually synchronized to a standard established by the International Telegraph and Telephone Consultative Committee (CCITT). Efforts have been made to synchronize a PRU to a packet by using a nonstandard (e.g., local) clock. For example, if the packet includes a synchronizing field, it is common to use the values of the field to derive the PRU's local clock. This is done using a formula such as $EQU\ fdiv=1/(10 \cdot fsync + fdata)$ where "fdiv" is the local clock, "fsync" is the synchronizing field value, "fdata" is the transmitted data value, and "10" is the number of bits used for the synchronizing field. Other clocks have also been used, including IEEE (Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers) and V.42bis clocks. The existence of non-standard clocks in the PSTN and in the LAN is due to an absence of centralized organization to assign clock values. If a standard is applied to nonstandard clocks, the result is an ambiguous description of time. This may result in unpredictable PRU behavior, jitter, packet loss, etc. One example of this erratic behavior is
