Job training and unemployment: a state-level analysis of the impact of welfare reform in three states. This paper uses data from the National Longitudinal Survey of Youth (NLSAY) to analyze the impact of the 1996 welfare reform law on several dimensions of labor force activity. Using an interrupted time-series design, we show that welfare reform was associated with significant increases in early-retirement exits, greater unemployment, and the decline of full-time employment. We find that the adverse effects of welfare reform were largest in states with high levels of welfare utilization. We estimate that the welfare reform law increased the short-term unemployment rate by 0.8 percentage points. Finally, we show that welfare recipients were less likely to work in low-skilled jobs in the year following welfare reform, consistent with our argument that employers were able to reduce entry wages for the poorest workers. Our results, however, do not support the hypothesis that welfare reform increased other types of unemployment. We find no evidence that welfare reform increased entry into occupations that involve weak employers. L. Kohout, R. Laflamme, R. Martinez, and D. King's Highway 108, commonly referred to as Highway 108, is a provincially maintained highway in the Canadian province of Ontario. It is a short distance in length, but connects several important destinations. The route runs from the northern end of Lake Huron on the township line between Montague and Mindemoya, north to Thorsby, north to Mindemoya and Lakeside, and finally north to the municipal boundaries of Mindem

Synthesis of unsymmetrical fused pyrroles with a novel tandem cyclization reaction. A novel tandem cyclization reaction between an aldehyde and a 4-substituted N-phenylpyrroline was reported. The reaction provides two alkoxycyclopentylidene oxindoles after subsequent hydrolysis. Both compounds were synthesized from aldehydes and pyrroline in the presence of a catalytic amount of iodine. These compounds were readily obtained in moderate to good yields from pyrroline derivatives without an additional electrophilic coupling reaction, and this tandem cyclization process is expected to be useful for the preparation of complicated fused pyrroles. This week, New Zealand will learn whether or not John Key is going to be Prime Minister for another term. A few days after that decision is announced, we will know whether or not there is any chance of our first same sex marriage coming to a vote before 2014. It is a matter of electoral politics but also a matter of individual rights, and we all have a stake in the outcome. But, the reasons that same sex marriage is a matter of politics, and not just rights are more complex and ultimately far more important than the simple argument of whether or not it should be legally binding.

When the referendum was held in 1993, it was held because public opinion had moved on. Opposition to gay marriage had increased, and politicians believed that they should cut back on their promises and get on with actually governing.

However, the reason that same sex marriage is a matter of politics is not because the numbers have shifted, or because politicians worry about the morality of their behaviour, but that this debate is the best example that national politicians can make about the limits of power, and the nature of political organisation. The greater New Zealand population became, the less the left and the right could agree about the state's responsibility for providing social security, and about what caused unemployment. The same has happened with the major issues of the past few decades, and the most recent example is immigration. The left continues to define the problem as racism, and the right to control who immigrates. There is no real politics being played on either side of the debate. The reason that same sex marriage is a matter of politics, is not because the right is using the issue to promote its social agenda. This issue has much more cultural and social than political significance. The right are targeting New Zealand's largest
