Conformations and energetics of the cyclic alpha-amino acid side chain: a conformational analysis in water. The conformational preferences of the cyclic, anti-configurations of the dihydroxyproline residues of bovine pancreatic trypsin inhibitor (BPTI) and a pGlu-Pro-4Lys cyclic sequence from a human pyridoxal-5'-phosphate dependent enzyme have been studied in aqueous solution by NMR and restrained molecular dynamics techniques. The information on the conformation of the cyclic side chain can be enhanced when resonance assignments are available. In BPTI, for instance, the conformational preferences of the Pro 3 and Pro 6 side chains have been derived, and the data compared to gas-phase calculations. The results show that the conformations of the Gly 2 to Pro 3 linkage are independent of the glycylic side chain conformation. The planarity of the Gly 2 to Pro 3 linkage is, however, not independent of the configuration of the Gly 1 side chain. The conformation of the linker is, for both the Gly 1 and Gly 2 side chains, more extended when Gly 1 is in the all-trans conformation than when it adopts the gauche conformation. In the range of the gauche and all-trans conformations, the conformation of the cyclic side chain is slightly stabilized by the electrostatic interaction with Arg 12, but the Gly 1-Pro 2 bond is destabilized by the same interaction.
