The prospect of moving to a tariff-free zone is an interesting one – given that the United States and China already have a free trade agreement, would a free trade zone be more or less attractive than a tariff-free one? That’s a question that economists will have to figure out, but it’s also an important one because a free trade zone would open the door for more than just those two countries.“When the GCC and Jordan say they want to develop a ‘free trade zone,’ it is clear that they mean that there will be zero tariffs between their countries,” said Daniel Rosenblatt, a professor at the Graduate Institute in Geneva who specializes in international trade. “But what they are not saying, quite frankly, is what they are going to be aiming for as the goal of their free trade zone. They are not saying that they want a world trade system.” The goal of the GCC-Jordan-Bahrain-Kuwait-Oman trade zone is to strengthen the development of the GCC, but it also is designed to help Jordan and Bahrain in particular to boost regional manufacturing and exports, said Joshua Waller, a researcher for the International Trade Centre.The GCC, which is headquartered in Riyadh, is facing many economic problems, most notably the growing challenge of Islamic State, but it is also facing an oversupply of oil and thus suffers from a lack of capital. Jordan, the poorest country in the Arab world, is looking for ways to boost its exports, and its desire to obtain more oil refining equipment has helped it join the trade zone to strengthen its ties with Kuwait and Bahrain.Jordan is a member of the Arabian Trade Free Zone and the Gulf Cooperation Council Development.“Clearly, the GCC’s membership in these
