The P50-GAST activities of gravid women in the second half of pregnancy were studied. The activities of P50 from different sources were correlated with the gestational ages at which spontaneous abortions occurred and with bleeding and cramps in the third and fourth months after delivery. In spite of the wide variation in activities of P50 from a number of sources, these activities did not correlate with gestational age. For certain P50 sources, there were no observed differences between the activities of P50 from aborting versus nonaborting women. For other sources, in the nonaborting group, there were no observed differences between the activities of the P50 from women who had spontaneous abortions versus women who had unaffected pregnancies. The results were not affected by variation in the activities of the P50 sources studied. The present studies did not demonstrate increased P50 activities in aborting versus nonaborting gravid women. The long-term goal of the proposed research is to delineate the precise molecular details of the mitochondrial translocation of the newly synthesized mitochondrial proteins. The significance of this work rests on our belief that it will provide better understanding of how membrane contact sites of the inner mitochondrial membrane are formed, and will lead to more effective ways to manipulate mitochondrial functions. The first part of the proposal focuses on elucidating the molecular details of a recently described mitochondrial translocation process that is accompanied by the folding of a newly synthesized mitochondrial matrix protein, cytochrome oxidase. The mechanism of this folding of the mature protein is not understood at all;
