But when a building in the neighborhood needs repairs, they call the Corps. "We feel like that's how we really get our infrastructure back up to date," says Manger. "And it kind of makes sense. It's not always an easy thing to really tackle on a riverbank." Gary Conley is a riverkeeper at the Headwaters Trust in Northwest Portland. He says the Corps makes smart decisions about what kinds of projects need to be done where and when. For example, Manger says the Corps installed catch basins on the South Burnside River a few years ago to catch debris and deter pollution. That's typically why Manger says the Corps implements projects in the neighborhood; it's where there are a lot of buildings, there's ongoing maintenance, and there's a defined public right-of-way. The Corps often loans money to these types of places and charges interest, says Manger, so it makes sense to grab it when you can. Conley says it's part of the Corps' mission to encourage new development in Northwest Portland, since it increases the area's tax base and helps build a strong river for everyone. "If we can just do more things out in the river, and outside of the river, at the edges of the river, we'll be able to improve the overall health of the river over time," says Conley. The Corps doesn't own any of the land in the headwaters, and often they'll need to lease it or buy it from the current owners. It's a fair-trade process, says Conley, and sometimes the Corps
