Molecular mechanisms involved in the development of congenital cataract. Cataract is among the most common congenital diseases; therefore, searching for the exact molecular mechanisms involved in the pathophysiology of congenital cataract is of great interest to both clinicians and patients. A Medline literature search was conducted in November 2014 using the terms congenital cataract, uveal tract morphology, development, gene, signaling, pathway, protein, and cross-talk to identify the most relevant genes, signaling pathways, and molecules involved in the pathogenesis of congenital cataract. Then, we compiled a list of genes and their effects. Chromosomal abnormalities, environmental, genetic, and maternal factors, as well as gene mutation, play a role in the pathophysiology of congenital cataract. Furthermore, dysregulation of several genes and signaling pathways has been reported to lead to congenital cataract. This review summarizes the current understanding of the relevant genes and signaling pathways involved in the pathogenesis of congenital cataract.Jared Foster In a new report, a U.S. military watchdog found that "U.S. forces and their Iraqi counterparts engaged in a regular pattern of unlawful killings of Iraqi civilians in Iraq through at least April 2006" and that the military's current court-martial system under which two Army officers are charged for the killing of civilians "appears unlikely to ensure a fair trial." Casey also warned in the report, delivered to Congress, that "a growing body of evidence suggests that the Iraq war has become a quagmire for the United States." Casey's office did not immediately respond to an inquiry about the report's contents. In it, the general concluded that "the system of criminal proceedings for the U.S. military is not effective." The alleged pattern of killing began in October 2004, the report said, and continued through April 2006, when a "conciliatory process" between U.S. forces and Iraqis was launched in Tikrit. The alleged pattern involves the death of at least 81 civilians, including 50 children and nine pregnant women, at the hands of U.S. forces, Casey's office said. In at least
