Q: Is it wrong to use square brackets in a non-array context? This is a question related to using square brackets in JavaScript. There is a following statement: `tarantula[comments].push(myInt);` I think it is wrong. Why? For example, `var myInt = 10; tarantula[comments].push(myInt); alert(tarantula[comments]);` It returns undefined. But I would understand it if the context of the variable was an array, because array indices may not be directly accessed. I know it is not wrong, since it gives the expected result. But I do want to know if there is any "official" way to say it is wrong? A: Firstly, in your example the context of `myInt` is an Array, it has been declared as an array in an earlier line, it's entirely possible to have a variable that references an array whose contents are undefined, however you cannot index into undefined and thus it's not that wrong to use square brackets for this example. To illustrate: `var x = undefined; var y = [1, 2, 3, 4, 5]; x[2]; // ReferenceError y[2]; // ReferenceError` No-one would condone storing undefined as a value in an array though, as it makes it inaccessible by referencing the element, and as of ECMAScript 2015 they have added `Object.defineProperty` to create a property with a non-enumerable value, like so: `var x = undefined; Object.defineProperty(x, 2, { value: 4 }); x[2]; // 4` Thirdly, you can use the square bracket notation for accessing properties of objects, however you cannot access properties of non-primitive values, for example this: `x = {}; x["foo"]; // Error, "foo" is a string x.foo; // Error, property does not exist` If you're concerned about JavaScript being generally 'soft' with its type-checking, you can look at this example of how to enforce strict object checking in some situations. smiling or pensive moments. Police in a wealthy suburb of Los Angeles opened an investigation on Sunday into a shooting that wounded a man who was near the Santa Monica Pier, where the rapper Tupac Shakur was shot and killed in 1996. The unidentified Los Angeles County sheriff's sergeant said he shot a man on Saturday afternoon on the pier, where police are focusing on the time of Tupac's death on the night of Dec. 25, 1996, according to the Los Angeles Times. He also said the man was hit in the foot and the shoulder but did not have life-threatening injuries. The sergeant said he and his partner were standing on the pier, checking for drugs and weapons, when they heard shots fired. He said he got a radio call saying shots were fired, and he and his partner went toward the sound.
