There has long been a need for a vaporizing and inhalation device that delivers the medications like these in a much effective and much safer manner. This device should be easy for the patient to carry, while maintaining the drug in its most active and healthy form. Many of the currently available products are bulky or expensive and are not easily portable. This invention is thought to be very effective, particularly for the relief of lung problems by reducing all of the harmful side effects that can be associated with other inhalation methods. One problem in the prior art arises from the fact that most commercially available inhalers require some form of pressurizing. It is thought that with drugs like these that are to be inhaled, any form of pressurization has the effect of crushing the drug and making it very ineffective. The problem with this is that, if too much pressure is used, the drug can be expelled from the lungs with the expungement of unwanted byproducts which can cause bad side effects.

In the sixties this was the most popular variety in West Germany, but since the seventies it has declined in popularity and has even been out performed by Pinot Noir. Pinot Noir- As the name implies, this is a red grape, but with clear tones of blue in the color. Sauvignon Blanc- Comes from northern France, and is the most popular of the white grapes grown in Germany today. Compared to Pinot Noir, this variety is lighter and tends to be more elegant and with more citrus notes in it. Cabernet Sauvignon-The classic red grape of Bordeaux and also of some German producers. Sauvignon Blanc, Chardonnay and Pinot Noir are not of German origin. They are grown as part of the global wine-growing "Third-World" of the market. Other varieties grown in Germany today are : Riesling- a white wine variety, grown all over Germany. Used mostly in the West of the country.
