A: You've said the answer is "No!" What has not been said is what you have in mind for the answer. The regex from the first code example just looks for the substring dvdrip. It's often wise to look at a regex on regexr.com which provides a trial run on a regex as you build it, allowing you to see if the regular expression is working as you want it to and what needs to change. Use a standard IDE It's never going to be as fast as writing your own regex, but it's very likely it will be much faster than where you're trying to do it. Xcode has a built in regex tool which integrates with it very well and which can provide live feedback as you make changes to it. It also includes some language specific tools, which will be very useful to you. You will be able to ask it to print out the equivalent regular expression, and you will be able to see this in the editor window as you make changes. Windows users can use something like notepad++ or similar software that supports regexes as an alternative. When you're using a regex in programming, you can write the regex in a format that helps the computer to build it efficiently, so that it does not have to re-parse it each time. This means that rather than calling the regex several times, you pass it the text it is given once (if it's a single regex), or you pass it an array of the text once and it builds it once in its own memory. So we can also write your regex with a string and a test string, something like this:

bool
hasDvdrip(std::string &match, std::string &test) { const auto dvdripMatch =

```
"dvdrip"; const auto dvdripTest =
"dvdrip"; std::smatch match; std::regex
reDvdrip ("dvdrip "); std::regex re {reDvdrip}; if (std::regex_match(test, match, re)) return true; return
std::regex_match(match, test, re); } And then compare each test to the match to see whether or not they match: for (const
auto
