What's New In Adobe Photoshop CC 2015 Version 17?

Q: Storing the output of a subprocess.call in a variable I'm new to Python and I'm trying to store the output of a subprocess.call into a variable, in a way that it can be used later on: `import subprocess user='myuser' password='mypassword' subprocess.call('pwgen -s 30 -n 10 -e 18 -t 10', stdout=subprocess.PIPE) login = user + ':' + password print('Login:'+ login)` It works, but I don't really like how I first have to open the pipe to the subprocess. I want to be able to open the pipe straight into the user variable and then print the login straight away. Is this possible and, if so, how can I achieve this? A: You just need to collect the output using stdout: `import subprocess user='myuser' password='mypassword' subprocess.call(['pwgen', '-s', '30', '-n', '10', '-e', '18', '-t', '10'], stdout=subprocess.PIPE) login = user + ':' + password print('Login:'+ login)` As an aside, the output of a Windows program that uses the cmd.exe shell is different from a Linux command. On Linux, the shell will see the output as different lines of the shell environment. To account for that, you would do: `import subprocess user='myuser' password='mypassword' subprocess.call(['pwgen', '-s', '30', '-n', '10', '-e', '18', '-t', '10'], stdout=subprocess.PIPE, universal_newlines=True) login = user + ':' + password print('Login:'+ login)` For Linux, there is no universal newline at the end of the text.
