What's New in the?

A novel mutation of the CYP11B2 gene in an individual with precocious puberty and primary congenital adrenal hyperplasia. We describe a girl with familial premature pubarche, primary adrenal insufficiency, and a form of congenital adrenal hyperplasia due to an alteration in the CYP11B2 gene. Analysis of the available family members revealed that the father had a similar clinical profile. The index patient was a female with primary adrenal insufficiency and short stature, who developed early puberty at the age of 11. She was tall for age and overweight for her age. Evaluation of adrenocortical function revealed low cortisol and low aldosterone levels. In view of these findings, the girl was treated with glucocorticoid replacement. In addition, genetic studies were performed because of her short stature and low cortisol level. Molecular analysis revealed that the father had a nonsense mutation (F99Y) of the CYP11B2 gene. This mutation results in the production of a partially active protein lacking key structural elements of the enzyme. Our patient's phenotype fits well into the estimated defect in biallelic mutant alleles with nonsense mutations of the CYP11B2 gene.To order by phone, please call +44 (0)141 863 8141 Centrelink's motto is "Protecting you for life".
