* _Getting Started with Photoshop CS2_ by Blaine Fontana provides beginners with a starting point. This book provides a great introduction to Photoshop because it explains the fundamentals of making images and offers many tips and techniques for problem-solving. (McGraw-Hill, $32.50.) ## Moving and resizing images One of the most common tasks in Photoshop is resizing an image. Sometimes, your image will be too big for the resolution that you want to print. For example, say you want to print a poster that has a resolution of 200 dpi, but you have a photo that's 640×360 pixels. When you print the image at 200 dpi, the photo will look cropped. Figure 16-2 illustrates what you can see if you print a photo of too big a dimension. But wait! The photo is really only 640×480 pixels, and that's still 2,400×3,200 pixels, so the photo can really be printed. Also, notice that the photo still looks great, so you needn't worry about resizing. Figure 16-2: When you make a print of an image that's larger than what the resolution of the print is, you see a crop. When you work on images, you should crop the image to the best quality you can get for the print. In other words, you should get the best contrast you can with good color and sharpness. A good way to crop an image is to use the Select tool in Adobe Bridge, also called a _culling tool_. You simply select the edges of the image and drag inward. The magic happens in Photoshop's Crop tool, as shown in Figure 16-3. Click the Crop tool and drag inward. The crop tool snaps to the edges of your image and updates the _clipping mask_, meaning it keeps the outside of the image at the same resolution as the rest of the image. Figure 16-3: Use the Crop tool to refine your image. Photoshop automatically creates a clipping mask as it crops the image, but if it doesn't, you can create a clipping mask by following these steps: 1. Crop your image. 2. Choose Image⇒Adjustments⇒Crop. 3. The Adjust Crop dialog box opens, as shown in Figure

-processing industries. Most small and medium-sized manufacturing companies are also looking at the OLEDs as there are developments as a replacement to the CRT. Ironsides, another 2k gold supplier, in this case from the UK, launched its new CloudStore product this week. The new, 3D and full colour storing system is intended to address the ever increasing storage demand for users of tablets and smartphones. It claims to deliver up to 4 times the on-board storage space for the same or even lower cost. The CloudStore product should be available initially to use with Apple's iPad tablets. The company claims that the product is the first to be fully 3D capable, allowing you to store 1.7 gigapixels worth of images from phones and tablets. "The CloudStore provides desktop users with a new way to archive and access their digital photos," says Ironsides' co-founder and CEO, Jaspreet Yadav. "The product is the first to be fully 3D capable and it leverages the ability of the iPad's accelerometer to detect the tilt of the iPad in the same manner that the iPod touch and iPhone are able to detect a user's hand movement to track changes in camera orientation." Ironsides says the CloudStore is built on the IBM 3270 Data Storage Architecture and uses a rewritable media product, just like that used in Blu-ray discs. For those asking for "less coal, more fish" the UAE based media giant Zafin is looking at a move into OLEDs. The company has launched its new ViewTouch technology and says the product offers "a superior tactile viewing experience." ViewTouch also allows each display to be custom configured for a specific application. "The ViewTouch is the first display to feature organic light emitting diode (OLED), a technology that offers a markedly superior viewing experience. OLED displays are flexible, lightweight, portable, durable and low power," says Zafin's head of development and innovation, Dr Elham Al Ghamdi. The display technology is also able to project graphics and images directly onto the surface, providing users with a much more realistic visual experience. This is due to the matrix of pixels comprising the display giving a much more vivid picture. The product will be showcased at the Consumer Electronics Show and will be on display at Zafin's stand in the keynote presentation by Nikon. Tuesday, January 10, 2010 The French company
