May 26, 2010 The Medical College of Georgia and Georgia Tech jointly held a BioSAFE workshop May 16-17, 2010 in which they discussed infectious diseases protocols, including needle stick injuries. At the meetings, Dr. Tom Lindauer of the Georgia Department of Public Health explained how the state has attempted to minimize the risk of transfusion-transmitted disease by eliminating the use of needles for blood collection. Another attendee commented on the increase in fear among patients about getting blood drawn. Dr. Lindauer said that fear of needles has been increasing for several years, but that the overall risk is less than one in a million. Georgia has greatly reduced the risk of getting HIV and hepatitis by eliminating the needle used for blood collection. At the same time, Georgia has also reduced the risk of getting a disease transmitted by blood transfusions by abolishing blood banks. At present, fewer than 1 percent of Americans have HIV, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. A few hundred thousand Americans have hepatitis, the government estimates, and there are fewer than 1,000 cases a year. About 20 to 30 percent of AIDS patients suffer chronic liver disease. Georgia has joined other states such as California, Florida, Indiana and Washington in attempting to ban the use of non-pain-relieving needles on patients. Non-pain relieving needles are also being phased out at hospitals and in clinics in those four states and Puerto Rico. Florida's law was challenged and was overturned, and that ruling was appealed by the Florida Department of Health. That appeal is now pending in the Florida Supreme Court. A third regulation is also being challenged by the Florida chapter of the American Medical Association, which sued to prevent the state from banning the use of non-pain relieving needles. FDA The Food and Drug Administration recently asked three hospitals in the Atlanta area to voluntarily stop using patient-friendly disposable lancets for testing blood-sugar levels, according to Dr. Jay Henry, a licensed dietician and medical director of Patient Assisted Outcomes at Georgia Tech. That request came in a letter from Dr. Scott Gottlieb, the FDA commissioner. Lancets cost pennies and use less than one-thousandth of a cent to manufacture. There are several kinds. The FDA has issued a new recommendation that health care professionals use the Sure Step lancet, which has been clinically proven to produce lancet-associated
