On the index page, it lists all jobs created or submitted. However, I want to give the user the ability to create and manage their own jobs on another page (for example, create a new job called "my job"). I'd like to do this on the front end, is there a good method to push the data from the index action in the jobs controller to a new controller for managing their jobs? So far, I've tried creating a new controller called "my_jobs", which only allows me to edit the jobs created or submitted (I don't have any data from the index page). I also don't think that's the correct controller to do this, but I couldn't think of another method. I'm really bad with rails, so I need a push in the right direction. Thanks. A: I'd suggest you to use resources pattern The name of resource indicates that it's an independent unit of your app In your case it should look like this: resources :jobs It will generate index action in jobs controller. When a user browses example.com/jobs it will show the index action. If user wants to browse example.com/jobs/new the index action in the controller job will be called, assuming that it passes new to it. You can handle it in the view. You can present your own edit and create form in view This form will work with new action Q: Difference between $(1)'s set and $(1).set in Javascript The following are examples I could find but I couldn't understand why I am seeing this difference: var hello = $(1);

"According to the new data, studies on animals can also confirm the existence of a group of amino acids on the cellular level, which are not found on the level of living bodies. While the composition of these amino acids is not yet completely clear, the key aspects that can be verified for the first time are the changes in their conformations."

The article also stated that the power of this method was that researchers can now examine the properties of these amino acids in relation to a type of exposure. There will be another testing, this time with the human subject. What it shows is that there are unique amino acids in our cells that support cell signaling and communication. When we are exposed to certain types of radiation, we expose ourselves to unique amino acids that have a disruptive effect on the external composition of the atoms in our body. This was confirmed by one of our researchers who is a former military bioweapons group. "If you look at the smallest components of modern living cells, you find that they are made up of what we call synthetic proteins and amino acids. In this context, it should be stated that the processes necessary to produce these proteins and amino acids are the property of living beings. After death, the membranes that enclose them begin to disintegrate. The protein is then freed and the amino acids are released. These last on various surfaces, namely the dried blood cells that are accessible to the body's immune system. These dried cells are added to the natural concentration of amino acids. In this way, a paper has become known as a dried blood cell. As a result of the body's immune system making dried cells in the process of eliminating bacteria, they can become toxic to the body. The water that protects this living material from the drying process is naturally released in the form of amino acids." In our view, this can be interpreted as an internal attack on the immune system by the long term exposure 648931e174
