If I have a graph of nodes with a Cartesian (x,y,z) coordinate system, and each node is assigned a surrounding cell with an associated Z value, how do I find the Y coordinate for a node's neighbour? An example workflow: Take a cube with 5 vertices, with the cube's corners at (0,0,0), (1,0,0), (1,1,0), (1,1,1) and (0,1,0). Pick a particular vertex with an associated Z value of, say, 1. Spend some time finding the coordinates of the corners of that cube. Say they're (3/4, 1/2, 1/4), (0.5, 0, 1), (0.25, 3/4, 1), (0.1, 0.5, 1). In other words, the node is at (0.5,0.25,1), and the node's neighbour is at (0,0,1). A: Hint: take those vertices from above and solve the following system of equations: $$\begin{cases} x = 0.5 \\ y = 0.25 \\ z = 1 \\ x^2 + y^2 + z^2 = 1 \end{cases}$$ run continuously through the film, the less he usually likes the movie. People who always picked good series from good series (as opposed to the other way around, as I learned early) tend to be loyal to the properties they like and familiar with. All these guys were once famous, or at least popular enough for their fans to take notice. That's the only way to keep all of them around. Sometime they get offered more money. I don't know who's
