Sex work, addiction, recovery and life beyond 25 Menu Using Your Decision-Making Process To Avoid An Unhealthy Relationship Relationships require all kinds of work to keep them going. You need to choose a partner who you will want to live and work with every day for the rest of your life. Although most of us can spend time on the “what” and “how” of the relationship game, what we often forget is that it takes work. The following is part of a series for the Wabash Narcotics Anonymous Group, from 2-7:30 p.m. each Monday. The focus of this series is on building healthy relationships while being honest about yourself and your relationships. Building healthy relationships starts with the decision-making process. We all have experienced the benefits of building trust through honest communication. As we make this decision, though, we tend to have feelings about the person we may choose, our feelings can easily be skewed by our past experiences and/or our expectations. If you want to make the best decision, first you need to know yourself. Ask yourself the following questions: What do you want from a relationship? Do you want it to be all good, or do you want to see the good and bad in someone? Do you want a partner who will feed you, have time to listen, and who will respect you and be honest with you, or do you need someone who will bully you, drink/use drugs with you, or who will leave you? Do you want to maintain your own autonomy and not feel like a cookie cutter partner? Or, will you want to have someone who will take care of you, give you advice and make life easier? Are you going to let this relationship control you, or are you going to choose control and live and work with the person? What is important to you in this relationship? How do you think the person will handle certain situations? How do you think they will handle making mistakes and failing? Is it worth the potential loss of autonomy to maintain your emotional health? What about any religious/spiritual orientation that would impact your relationship? If you have not discovered and clarified your answers to these questions, you will not be able to define your boundaries and communicate them clearly. You will not be able to identify the values and beliefs you have in yourself that you want to nurture and share with the person you choose
