Is there any difference between the following two snippets of Ruby code? foo = 123 # And foo = __FILE__ A: In the first example: foo is assigned to the value of 123. The value of foo is assigned to a local variable, $foo. This local variable's name, $foo, is available in the global scope (via $foo). In the second example: foo is assigned to the value of __FILE__. The value of foo is assigned to a local variable, $foo. This local variable's name, $foo, is not available in the global scope (since it is an assignment). In the Ruby world, the following is a typical use of the relative referencing for a name in a block: foo = "foo" bar = -> (x) { x = foo puts "bar is called: #{x}" } # foo is available to the block bar { puts "hello!" } # bar is available to the block Here, you use a block to assign the name foo to a different value. When you get to the puts "bar is called:" statement, foo is set to the value that was assigned in the block (so "bar is called: foo" is printed). A: The difference is described here: Ruby, like most languages, has two ways of naming variables: absolute and relative. The absolute name of a variable is made up of the name of the variable itself and the name of the block in which it is defined. The relative name of a variable is made up of the name of the variable itself and the name of the current (static) method or scope in which the variable is defined.
