To assess the relationships between serum retinol, alpha-tocopherol, and alpha-carotene concentrations and dietary fat intakes in healthy men. A cross-sectional study. Two hundred nineteen healthy men in a population-based cohort study from the Cooperative Health Research in the Region of Augsburg, Germany. The study population consisted of subjects who were residents of the study area, aged 18 to 60 years, and participated in a health survey between 1988 and 1990. Based on a 3-day food record, dietary information was collected. Spearman correlation coefficients were used to assess associations between serum concentrations of retinol, alpha-tocopherol, and alpha-carotene and dietary intake of energy and fat. High intake of total energy was significantly correlated with lower serum concentrations of all three carotenoids. The relationships between serum retinol and alpha-tocopherol and dietary intakes of polyunsaturated fatty acids and saturated fatty acids were inconsistent. The effect of energy intake on serum carotenoids seems stronger than that of dietary fat. Higher intakes of total energy may reduce serum levels of serum retinol and alpha-tocopherol and alpha-carotene.
