It took a while for me to learn how to do it, but once I figured out the secret of using my thermometer to boil the water for my "black" coffee, my coffee became infinitely better. I was scared to use my thermometer for "white" coffee too, for fear of ruining the coffee, but I was too anxious to just use regular water, and my coffee did not improve. Eventually I learned it. At first I'd boil my water for my "white" coffee for about 3 minutes, and my timer would say "1 minute," but I'd generally take 2 minutes and a half. After I kept finding my coffee still had no taste, I decided to try it with hot water at first, but it worked! So, I'd boil the water for my "black" coffee and water at the same time for 3 minutes, and my timer would say "2 minutes," and I'd let it boil for another minute, and my timer would say "3 minutes," and I'd then take my one cup of coffee and place it in the freezer for 10 minutes. I'd then try my "white" coffee and hot water at the same time. I'd put them in the same pot, and let them boil together, and my timer would say "6 minutes," and I'd take the "black" coffee out, put it in the freezer for 10 minutes, and take my "white" coffee, and put it in the freezer for 10 minutes. When I tried them, I did not feel like my coffee was inferior at all. I've found that taking the mixture out of the freezer 3 or 4 times per day seems to keep the flavors fresh, though I'm not sure if it would work for less frequent. If it does not work for you, get yourself a pressure cooker and learn how to use it!
