The tools in Photoshop are best used to create finished graphics; however, they can be used to enhance existing photos when you first open them in Photoshop. After you create an image in Photoshop, you need to save it as a new file to use it in another application. Elements is a free, open-source alternative to Photoshop that is a great tool for hobbyists and photographers. It also has a robust online community that includes useful tutorials. However, the user interface (UI) is in a different programming language than Photoshop's and is therefore more difficult to learn. As a result, it's targeted towards hobbyists and creatives. Because Elements lacks the industry standard tools found in Photoshop, it's great for hobbyists. It also provides a vibrant online community of training and information in the form of podcasts and video tutorials. This book concentrates on Photoshop's features, but it's easy to adopt Elements' features instead. For example, a photo image imported into Elements looks like that in Figure 3-2, where the layers are visible. Figure 3-2: The layers of a photo image are visible in Elements. Creating Contests or Photo Manipulations When you post your photos to websites like Flickr (www.flickr.com), you have the opportunity to share them with the world. If you decide to do so, you might want to work on your photos in Photoshop to make them more eye-catching and interesting. If you decide to use Photoshop, you can use it to enter and win contest sponsored by Flickr or some other website, as shown in Figure 3-3. A photo can even be your entry into a weekly photo contest. Figure 3-3 shows an example of a photo image that won an award in the weekly Flickr Photo Contest. This photo was created in Photoshop using the adjustments available on the top-right panel to create some special effects and to brighten it. Figure 3-3: You can enter a contest or photo manipulation contest with Photoshop. However, it's important to keep in mind that this process is entirely electronic. The people judging your entry do so by simply looking at a photo. The photo doesn't display the original photo, but rather a modified photo that a computer created based on the information in the photo. Therefore, entry into a contest or photo manipulation contest isn't a true test of your skills. It's a test of your Photoshop skills. Photo-

I would like to do something like this if this is possible. For example `$(document).ready(function(){ $.ajax({ type: "POST", url: "", data: "ajax=1&msg=Lost+your+self&username=" + username + "&category_id=1" }); });` so in `sendlostmessage.php` i will read the variables and do what ever im suppose to do Any ideas? A: As far as I know you can't change the way the server accepts data. But you could add the data on the client side and loop through it: `var input = document.getElementById('input'); var token = 'get lost'; var value = input.value; if (value == token) { $.ajax({ type: "POST", url: "", data: { 'ajax': 1, 'msg': 'Lost your self', 'username': username, 'category_id': 1, 'token': value } }); } And your PHP: $data = $_POST['data']; if ($data == 'get lost') { //`
