Definition of BUDDING Budding is the process of growing the end of the blossom tube or flowering stem to a substantial length. After the bloom has dropped off, the stem will usually grow. Budding takes place inside the bud receptacle, a thickened, swollen area at the base of the flower. Inside the receptacle are miniature pistils, called carpels, that produce pollen and stamens, the male and female reproductive organs of a plant, respectively. Once the pollen and fertilized ovules have become attached to the stamens, a small depression appears in the receptacle, and a shoot begins to grow through it. Once the bud reaches a sufficient size, leaves appear and an inflorescence forms, like a little flower or flower cluster. The stalk that supports the bud receptacle usually dies off after budding.

Nadi (boat) Nadi (plural Nadis) is the singular of the word nadi (Sanskrit: नदि) which means canals. Nadi is used for rivers, lakes and ponds in general. Nadi is a common word in the native languages of South Asia, including Hindi, Urdu and Punjabi. Nadi in its feminine form, nadi, means a river or lake. In most cases, a nadi in South Asia follows the course of a river in the dry season and switches its direction in the rainy season. In South India, as well as in East and South-east Asia, a nadi can be a major waterway that can support water traffic and sail-boats, including traditional wooden traditional caravels and Thai bongkwa. In European languages, the same word is used for rivers, lakes, and canals (and sometimes canals alone). Many Asian languages, including the Indian languages, have an equivalent word in their language. For example, in Japanese and Korean, "nadaima" and "najeong", respectively, are used to refer to the surface of a lake. The word nadi is common in South Asia, perhaps because of the presence of multiple streams that flow at various places in the region, and cross each other, running parallel and meeting at a point. For example, two rivers from east and west of the Indian subcontinent flowing into each other at the port of Calcutta, the Buriganga River and the Ganges. The latter is also called Gand

The major goal of this study is to develop and evaluate a computer assisted therapy program for managing the symptoms of Adult Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (AADH). The program will target remediation of the cognitive deficits associated with this disorder. The program, which will have an interactive, adaptive format, has the potential to become a clinical procedure for the assessment, diagnosis and treatment of this disorder. The program will incorporate cognitive remediation techniques, group therapy, and a self-monitoring component. In Phase I of this project a prototype for the software was developed. During Phase II of this grant, the system will be enhanced and tested in three controlled studies. An initial evaluation of the effects of the therapy program will be made using a pretest-posttest repeated measures design, comparing the effectiveness of the program with a waiting list control group. Data from a second controlled evaluation will examine the stability of the treatment effect after the first six months of treatment. Third, data will be collected to document the relation between cognitive deficits, self-reported symptoms, and social functioning. In addition, participants will be followed longitudinally over the 12 month follow-up period. Longer term follow-up will allow for the examination of the continued efficacy of the program and examine its generalization to patients with ADHD in different settings. By this time, the treatment system will have been optimized and incorporated into the present behavioral and pharmacologic treatment programs for adults with ADHD. The program will also be evaluated for its integration with other independent research projects. This research is being carried out at the Psychiatric Institute of the SUNY at Stony Brook, which is a fully equipped research facility funded by the NIMH.

Deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) plasmids are linear replicating unit of DNA molecule, which has a useful genetic information. In prokaryotes, the DNA replication from the plasmid starts at the origin region and travels longitudinally from the origin region to the terminus region. Before this process the DNA replicase enzyme unwinds the DNA helix and brings the complimentary strands towards each other. Then at the replication fork, the complementary strands are linked together. The process of replication requires the enzyme, DNA helicase which unwinds the DNA helix and the primase enzyme which synthesizes the primer molecule before the replication initiates. The replication process further requires a polymerase enzyme which synthesizes deoxyribonucleotides at the replication fork and DNA ligase which links the complementary strands.
