What's New in the Adobe Photoshop CC 2014?

Have you ever wondered what it's like to fly one of those new-fangled environmentally friendly long-haul planes? Well now you can live that fantasy — just don't ask how you got a ticket. An Associated Press investigation has found that private charter companies and airlines that dominate the long-distance air travel business are flagrantly using loopholes and half-truths to deny passengers the right to know exactly how much carbon dioxide their trips create. Though the practice may seem somewhat harmless, leaving travelers unaware of the damage their frequent flier miles are doing to the planet has significant implications for how the airlines will compete with cleaner airlines and others, such as aircraft manufacturers, that are working toward a near-zero carbon footprint. "Imagine that you are trying to get to the airport. You can't know, and you can't find out," said James P. Durkan, professor of political science and public administration at the University of Denver. "It's a bit like having a debt you don't know you have, and you can't pay."

Durkan and his colleagues analyzed more than 2,000 so-called environmental statements on the websites of more than two dozen major charter and airline companies. The researchers then looked at similar statements from American and Delta Airlines, which were the two largest charter companies and two of the most frequent long-distance fliers. The most glaring difference between the airlines' and charter companies' environmental disclosures was how the airlines stated their operational emissions. Most described their emissions in a direct manner, such as "fuel consumption" or "ton miles" or "avg lb. of CO_2/flight mile," according to the AP's analysis. Charter companies instead used a far more opaque form of language that did not spell out exact amounts. Instead, they said things like "operational operations" or "kerosene/fuel usage" or "avg CO_2/flight mile," which made it impossible to calculate the exact amount of carbon dioxide produced by the flights, according to the AP. Experts told the AP that the use of such legalese was far from a coincidence. "This has a lot to do with strategy and we cannot blame the charter companies for doing this," said Peter Phinney,
